Silence your inner critic

That quiet voice that questions your abilities or tells you that you don't belong can be powerful, but it doesn't have to lead. Understanding imposter syndrome can help you build confidence and resilience.

Imposter syndrome can affect anyone, at any stage. About 62% of people experience it. Doubting readiness, questioning success or worrying about keeping up can limit growth and wellbeing. Some things to try this month and beyond:

- Name it: Recognize these thoughts as common and temporary.
- Track wins: Keep a simple list of accomplishments, skills and positive feedback.
- Challenge it: Replace self-criticism with realistic, compassionate self-talk.
- Connect: Talk with trusted colleagues or mentors for perspective.

Small shifts in thinking can quiet the inner critic and help you show up with confidence.

Stress in children and teens

Summer brings fun and flexibility, but changes in routine, activities and social pressures can increase stress for children and teens. Stress may show up as irritability, worry, sleep changes, headaches, stomachaches or withdrawal from social activities.

Help kids relieve stress in healthy ways:

- Exercise: Walking, biking, outdoor play and sports help release tension and boost mood.
- Write or draw: Journaling or creative art helps children express worries and process emotions.
- Let feelings out: Invite kids to talk, laugh, cry and safely express anger.
- Reduce screen time: Encourage board games, hobbies, social time and volunteering.
- Relax: Practice breathing exercises, meditation, prayer, yoga or muscle relaxation.
- Laugh together: Humor lowers stress and builds connection.
- Eat healthy foods: Nutritious meals support energy, mood and emotional balance.

Small daily habits can make a big difference in helping kids feel calm, confident and supported.

Working on emotional wellbeing

- Emotional wellbeing involves tuning into your feelings, including how you handle stress and bounce back from hard times.
- Small, intentional steps can help. Practice self-compassion by talking to yourself as you would a trusted friend. Ground your body, take short breaks to breathe deeply, stretch or walk. Reframe thoughts, such as "I'm not good enough," with "I'm learning and growing." Strengthen connection with others by sharing challenges, seeking feedback and accepting support.
